Can the balcony locker be used to store skin care products

Overview

According to Henry, while most products are commercially made with stable and lab-tested packaging, storing your skin care in the bathroom can decrease the shelf-life of your products due to the constant exposure to heat and humidity. “Some ingredients are inactivated by light,” explains Skincare.com consultant and board-certified dermatologist Dr. This can also be true when certain formulas are heated—caused by either a steamy shower or direct sunlight—as it can render certain ingredients within them. Some of these products are quite expensive, so you must store them properly to ensure they work properly until you use them. To help your cosmetic products last longer, keep them in a dark place away from direct sunlight. Instead, you tend to put the tiny little tubes of lotion or the tiny little bottles of cleanser and conditioner in the back of the fridge, so. Let's face it, storing your skin care in the bathroom has to be better than forgoing all of it entirely and sleeping with makeup on, right?

While we will never advise sleeping in your makeup, if you are putting the time, money and effort into your skin care routine, storing it in the bathroom may. Why don't you start digging around for a pen and paper and settle in for a little 101 education on how to store your skin care products. Because odds are, what you think you know isn't at all what's going on. Toners/Essences This can be tricky as it depends on the.
